

For the past couple of months I have worked with News of Polonia columnist Prof. Przystawa to get a visa for him to come to the United States. After Prof. Przystawa received the visa, I sent an e-mail to many people notifying them of his coming visit and asking for volunteers to help arrange speaking arrangements in Polonia and American Universities. In the e-mail I also attached several articles that Prof. Przystawa had written in the News of Polonia.

I received the following e-mail from Political Science Professor, Dr. Don Pienkos regarding Prof. Przystawa's passion of correcting the defects of the political process in Poland, particularly the electoral process.

Professor Pienkos's letter will be followed by Prof. Przystawa's reply.

A Response to Prof. Przystawa's statement on Poland's need to change its electoral process

By: Donald Pienkos

I have the following comments on Prof. Przystawa's views about the need for Poland to change its electoral process.

1. First of all, it is important to stress that there is no absolutely "best" system for determining the will of the electorate in a democracy. The "single member district" system followed in the United States and in the United Kingdom of course has its plusses, but this system is by no means without its flaws. For example, in the U.S. we have many Congressional districts where "gerrymandering" occurs. Gerrymandering is the practice by which the borders of electoral districts are so drawn as to guarantee that one party's candidates will always win election and the minority will always remain in the minority. In Britain, too, it has been noted with respect to the upcoming parliamentary election that the Labour Party enjoys a built-in advantage in the seats that will be filled in the election. Only if the Conservatives win by a substantial overall margin are they likely to be able to gain an absolute majority in the House of Commons. If the vote is fairly close, Labour wins.

Moreover, in single member district election systems, only the two major parties usually "count" in what is often described as a "winner take all" system. Third or fourth parties have virtually no chance to win or even become factors in elections, due to the often-made argument that people are "throwing away" their votes by supporting such parties in single member district contests. Only the candidate who comes in first, even by the narrowest margin, wins.

The proportional representation system used in many countries to determine the will of the voters has its flaws too. While every party that surpasses the minimal threshold to be taken seriously will win seats in the parliament, the result can be a situation where no party has an absolute majority to put through its program. Bargaining for power becomes the rule after the election, and the results of such bargaining may well be very different from what the voters imagined. Moreover, in proportional representation systems, people vote for the party and its program, not the candidate who can best represent the interests of the population in a particular constituency of the country.

2. Let's turn specifically to Poland. There, the decision after 1989 was to go with a very generous PR system of electing legislators. This action had the effect of saving the former communist party from extinction. This was because the Communists, or post-Communists, or SLD or SDRP, or whatever they called themselves, had they operated in a "single member district plurality wins" system would nowhere have won more than 10 or 15 percent of the total vote in any district. As a result, the party would have been relegated to the "ash heap" of politics in Poland.

The original (and radical) proportional representation system adopted in Poland after 1989 also stimulated an extraordinary fragmentation of the Solidarity movement into many small parties. These groups engaged in a great deal of infighting, even though in point of fact they had more in common than they admitted.

Proportional representation as practiced in Poland led to the amazing election of 1993, where the SLD and the PSL gained power with almost 2/3 of the seats in the parliament, despite winning only 35 percent of the total popular vote! In that election, nearly all of the post-Solidarity parties failed to meet the very low threshold of 5 percent in order to gain

The word is out... Prince Charles of Wales is seeking new digs in Poland's Lower Silesia. Although the British Embassy did not confirm it, it refused to make any comments other than "the Prince would like to help with the reconstruction in order to save this architectural gem" ...or something along those lines. The palace of Bozków, originally built in 1787, is the actual object of interest of his royal highness. Grand enough to host let's say, fox hunt parties... So there you go... Not that they ran out of castles in Wales or Scotland. Maybe he is just bored with them all... Or maybe he read the latest issue of the Economist...

Perhaps Charles is browsing some new "old" boundaries. Centuries ago, the Kingdom of Poland offered the best hunting grounds in all of Europe. Today, they still have the forests, the hunting tradition, and kings will soon follow....

Oh, Charles was also interested in preserving old country cottages, but I do not believe that the heir to the British throne and his wife, Camilla, Duchess of Cornwall, would consider a plain country cottage impressive. You won't see it in the next episode of "Cribs..."

The royal couple's three day trip to Poland included breakfast with the Polish president and his wife, Maria, to which Camilla wore horse-riding boots (!), a meeting with Polish troops assigned to Afghanistan, and chatting with musicians selected for the various Chopin music performances (part of the celebrated Year of Chopin). But the part of the visit that received the most media attention was the Prince's stop at Białowieza Forest, which some 450 bison call home. Another 400 is on the Bielorussian side - furry traitors...

Informal royal visits are nothing uncommon. The Norwegian royal couple while in Poland, traveled by train with the intent of checking on young Norwegians studying medicine in Krakow. Charles visited Poland twice before each time invited by the Shakespearean Club (Yes, they do have one... and they have even been holding an International Shakespearean Festival in Gdańsk since 1993). They are not so brainless up there, as some Poles speak Shakespearean...

President Kaczyński and his wife were not the only hosts. The Bogdanowicz family from the small town, Kruszyniany, in Eastern Poland, also had the honor. Bogdanowiczes are Polish Muslim Tatars and for this exceptional occasion served the best of their special holiday menu. Still Mrs. Bogdanowicz, the lady of the house, lamented that the house was too small to have a sit-down dinner so everyone was served standing up. During the afternoon, the Polish Mufti was also present and later Charles had a chance to visit the town's mosque. The Prince, besides being fascinated by old country architecture, is also a promoter of eco-friendly food, so he apparently enjoyed the Bogdanowiczes' all organic, alcohol free meal. The traditional Tatar dancers entertained the guests.

A little confused by the Tatar presentation? You must have at least heard of the fresh tatar dish? It consists of the best quality raw beef or even better, veal (ground), a few drops of olive oil, a whole egg, salt and pepper. It's best to mix it by hand. Make a hole in the center and place the egg yolk, decorate with a finely chopped onion and (peeled) finely chopped pickle. Years ago, when we arrived in the US, a man with a Polish last name who owned the small deli across the street knew exactly what we needed the meat for. He picked the best piece for us, the best from the known source (!) and he ground it as we waited. Too bad the store did not survive big supermarket competition. We never had tatar since then.

There are some 5,000 Polish Tatars, not counting the Polish Muslim Tatars from Brooklyn, and take into consideration the fact that in pre-war Poland "when there was a break for mass, part of the class
